

FCC

Proceedings 17-108

Broadband internet access is not enhanced by lack of regulation in the market. I support the broad authority that the FCC has under Title II classification of internet providers. Given that regulation of the internet currently is overseen by the FCC, I fail to see how having little to no oversight will bring about more public good than not having any oversight.

Chairman Ajit Pai's plan to revisit how broadband internet access is regulated so soon after the FCC moved its legal authority to Title II is at best rank political partisanship and at worst racketeering that the Justice Department should investigate.
